Lee and Robbins (1995), drawing on psychoanalytic self-psychology theory (Kohut, 1984), have characterized this type of belongingness (or the lack thereof) as more precisely a sense of social connectedness. Social connectedness is considered an attribute of the self that reflects cognitions of enduring interpersonal connections.