The title is a bit unclear, but it seems like a discussion of early Peruvian photography and its importance in shaping regional identity. There are references to Arequipa and its blend of culture, as well as a discussion of how early photographs helped to form knowledge and understanding of the region. The text also touches on the influence of the visual arts in the context of photography, specifically in relation to the Andes and Machu Picchu.

Some key points include:

- Early Peruvian photography played a critical role in creating a cultural artifact from Machu Picchu.
- It was instrumental in raising historical consciousness from multiple perspectives.
- The Daguerreian Annual is mentioned as a significant publication in the field of photography.
- The book covers all key aspects of early Peruvian photography, from its historical context to its cultural impact.

The text also mentions the importance of understanding the role of photography in shaping regional identity, particularly in the Andes region. It touches on the way photographs can be used to construct narratives of the past, and how these narratives can influence our understanding of history.

Overall, the text seems to be an in-depth exploration of how early Peruvian photography helped to shape the understanding of the region, and its continued relevance in modern times.
