The Cuban Revolution had an equally profound impact on the literary world as it did on the art and culture of the region. In Cuba, the revolution fostered a spirit of freedom of expression. Joaquín Cordero’s novel “La Era de los Eléctricos” reflects the obsession with race that marked the apartheid regime, and prophetically depicts the beginning of the crumbling of the apartheid system in the future setting of Johannesburg in 1976. It expresses the concern of the African diapsora with apartheid, which was felt to be an affront to the entire race. The Detainee is a radioplay. The plot foreshadows the writer’s own imprisonment and his now familiar concerns about the vagaries of African politics.
