There is no question that policing is one of the most challenging contexts for mediation. Nonetheless, mediation holds much promise for changing the conversation. The President’s Task Force on 21st Century Policing identified mediation as a promising practice for police reform. The force stated: “Mediation, negotiation, and conciliation, among other conflict resolution strategies, are forms of alternative dispute resolution that allow disputants to engage in the process of collaborative problem-solving with a trained neutral mediator.”

If we hope to make progress in reducing police violence and improving public safety, we need to acknowledge the power dynamics at play in police-citizen encounters. That means engaging with the history of police use of force, the social, political, and cultural context that surround it, and the ways in which police violence is used to maintain power and control.

Debunking the Stigma of Police Violence OECD’s study, “Police Violence: A Global Study,” found that police violence is far more prevalent than previously thought. The study highlights the need for action to address this issue, and calls for cooperation among countries to share best practices and improve police training. It also calls for greater accountability and transparency in police discipline.
